every little distance a frog was posted with a glowworm on his head. Rather a queer candle-stick and candle, thought Arthur, while he trudged along downward. But when he reached the great cavern into which the steps ied, he forgot everything else in awe and admiration. The roof seemed strung with diamonds amid fretwork of silver that formed countless shapes, upon which the blaze of light from a great globe of dame shone with such splendor that Arthur was fain to hide his dazzled dyes and for a few moments he could distinguish nothing else.

When his eyes became accustomed to the glast of the glast, has the heavy one carnest and about the banquet hall, was crowded with fairies, but they had laid aside their sportive manuers and careless jestings, and seemed every one carnest and above the manuers and careless jestings, and seemed every one carnest and above the sorbed, and alleyes were turned toward a great curtain which hung at the end of the cavern, behind which a single file of t

There seemed no disorder or ill feeling although the space around the curtain was well filled; but every one seemed to know when his turn came, and to move out of the way the moment the desire was gratified.

Nimble Toe dropped in with the rest, and quietly waited for the others before him to pass in behind the curtain. It is therefore well to examine the tools on hand, put those in perfect order than the watched.
